to it." The College has every reason to feel secure and happy in his elevation to the episcopate. He has played the leading role in its inception as the chairman of the College Committee. It was his sanguine temperament that piloted it safely through the stormy conflict of opinions at the start. So we rejoice to see him now as its patron and proprietor. But he may feel sure that the lead he has given will continue to pervade the working of the institution.

Let the shirkers, the backsliders and the never-do-wells take a note of this. We have had but a few months of contact with him. But during this short period, he has made it
